Execution of any python class through constructor will give a new memory instance. Inpython there is no concept of public, private or protected concept like in other object oriented programming language like java, c++. So without creating hack we cannot make a constructor and that can also be broken.

At this point I do not know how to point to the same instance through a constructor for a singleton class. I only know how to do it through the static method getInstance().